Turnover costs 4x what you're tracking.

We make the invisible number visible.

YOUR TURNOVER NUMBER IS WRONG

Most companies track turnover rate. A percentage. It feels manageable.

The real number is turnover cost. Dollars walking out the door every time someone leaves.

$91,582

The average cost of a single departure.

That includes recruiting, ramp time, lost productivity, knowledge drain, and the ripple effect on the team left behind.

Most companies underestimate this by 4x or more. They budget for the backfill. They miss the 6 months of output gap, the 3 people who quietly start looking after their colleague leaves, and the institutional knowledge that walks out with no backup.

By the time someone resigns, the decision was made months ago.

The signals were there. The system just wasn't built to surface them.

WHAT CLOVER ERA MEASURES

Six leading indicators that surface flight risk before resignation.

C Consistency: Changes in check-in tone, frequency, and depth

L Language: Shifts in how someone talks about their role, team, and future

O Outreach: Decline in voluntary collaboration and cross-team participation

V Visibility: Withdrawal from meetings, projects, and discretionary effort

E Equilibrium: Disruption in work-life patterns that signal disengagement

R Recognition: Response to feedback, praise, and development opportunities

Your managers see these signals every day. They just don't have a system to read them.
